Binding site prediction. We have been developing prediction methods for the DNA-binding sites of transcription factors based on the statistical properties of the amino acids composing the DNA-binding domain of the protein. The predictive performance of the various methods developed so far has been evaluated on a collection of about 100 different transcription factors, and the best result obtained was a Pearson correlation coefficient of 0.62. When tested on the complete set of about 400 transcription factors for which binding sites have been experimentally determined, the best result was a correlation coefficient of 0.50. However, the reported correlation coefficient is misleading because of its spurious character: it is an average of several values calculated from different subsets of the dataset. Also, the average results do not necessarily reflect the performance obtained for a single transcription factor. We have therefore developed methods to provide a single estimate of the predictor performance for a single transcription factor. These tools can be used in the prediction of potential transcription factor binding sites. To assess the performance of the predictor, we have applied the methods to the 72 transcription factors that constitute the Myc Network Project. The results are reported in two cases: one in which the binding site of each transcription factor is given as a position weight matrix (PWM) and one in which we have developed a method of binding site prediction that is based on a logistic regression method and thus predicts a PWM for each binding site. The latter is implemented in the TFM search tool. The top returned binding sites for the 72 transcription factors in the TFM search tool are based on the Myc network project data for the available transcription factors, that is, the results of the search can be compared to experimentally validated sites. We have found that the top binding sites for only one transcription factor (TRF2) have been validated experimentally, and that among these only three do not match the top binding sites predicted by the TFM search tool. An analysis of the 5' region of the DNA sequence surrounding the top ranking sites confirms that experimentally validated binding sites are more than 3-5 times more likely to be among the top ranking sites than random sequences. This is a strong indication that the predictive power of the method is not spurious.
